

Caught in the excitement of the conversation, Samuel began sketching ideas for a mechanical device that could send the impulses over any distance.

He called the device a telegraph, and over time, he began developing a system of dots and dashes that could be transmitted through electrical impulses over wires.